Evelyn (Rockwell) Silva's memoir begins at the point immediately after World War 2 when she traveled to an area in the Pacific that had been a battlefield not long before. She chronicles her romance with Ernie Silva, along with her impressions of life on Saipan in 1947, which should captivate any one with an interest in that period and place. Her memories of childhood and the history of the Rockwell family in Illinois and New York yield a rich portrait of small-town American life in the early years of the 20th century.
